Description of Goalball

Goalball is a goal-oriented sport similar to hockey or soccer, which is played exclusively by visually impaired or blindfolded players. Developed in Eastern Europe following World War II, it came to the U.S. in the 1970's and is presently played internationally. The playing area has dimensions similar to those of Volleyball. Three players from each team are positioned at opposite ends of the court facing one another. They maintain their positions at the ends by following raised cord boundaries on the playing surface. The middle player of the three is placed slightly ahead of the players to his/her left and right to avoid collisions. The objective of the game is to roll a bell- filled ball fast enough to force it through the defenders and into their goal net, which is the width of the back line. Players defend their goal net by carefully listening for the ball. If the opponents successfully block the ball, they become the offensive team and throw the ball back in an attempt to score. The game is governed by rules, which when broken result in penalties as in soccer. Sighted referees monitor play from mid-court and from each of the four corners. The game is made exciting by the impact of the ball (3.5 pounds), speed of the ball (upwards of 40 mph) and by the players' volleyball-like acrobatics.
